result, either this logo may not be present within the ROM; or, the entire ROM may be unbootable. File/data Booting up the console usually involves loading a file/program from the console's internal memory. Before loading the file, the console writes the boot memory (SM801) with certain information and jumps to its address (e.g. 0xC4A40000) which then loads the file from its given location. There are also other functions in the console such as enabling the speaker, reading specific information from the serial port, resetting the console, and setting it to a low-power state. Console configuration The TMPC-0001 is usually configured by a set of 24-bit binary data bytes, which are written to the SM801's memory. These bytes are the data for the console's functionality. The console configuration bytes are sent to the console after power-up (before loading the configuration file). If the configuration bytes do not exist within the console's ROM, the console will not be able to boot. The following table (obtained from the user manual), shows all available data bytes within a TMPC-0001 based console. Console range The console range refers to the set of voltages, at which a working console can be powered, while enabling any of its functions. This range is sent to the console after power-up, which is the first time, the console is able to configure itself. If the console's range is not set to 0–1.8 V and the console is powered, the console may not be able to boot. The console range can be defined in both the configuration bytes and the boot file (if it is provided). If the boot file is provided, the console must use the same configuration bytes. The console's range cannot be changed once it is configured. Assignment tables While the console configuration is done after power-up, the initialization of the console's internal circuitry and the configuration of its peripherals, is done when the console is first powered on, which is before the configuration data is loaded. The TMPC-0001 provides three assignment tables which can be used to perform certain tasks. These assignment tables are called Console Table, Interrupt Table, and Timer Table. These tables are all defined within the console configuration, and usually contain a unique identification number for each table. If a specific assignment table is

Effect of kappa opioid agonists on the persistent inhibition of acetylcholine release at the frog neuromuscular junction. The effect of various kappa opioid agonists, including bremazocine, U-50,488, pentazocine and U-69,593 (Tyr-D-Lys-Phe-Phe-Asp-NH₂) on persistent inhibition of release evoked by 3×10^{-8} M nicotine was studied using the perfused, isolated neuromuscular preparation of the frog. At this concentration, as shown by the ordinary, phasic end-plate potential (EPP), nicotine causes only a temporary postjunctional inhibition. The inhibitory effect of the drugs tested was initially seen at 10^{-7} M and persisted for the duration of the experiments, with a slight decrease in the amplitude of the EPP at the end of the experiments. Under the influence of the drugs the EPP was more irregular, but the initial inhibitory effect remained on the face of the acetylcholine release site for at least 40 min. The drugs may have an effect on the nicotinic acetylcholine receptor at the release site and/or on the generation of the EPP or on the transmitter release process itself.

Q: How to get all the values of enum passed as an argument to function in c++ I was learning about enums and wondered how to obtain all the values of the enum type passed as an argument to a function. For example, in the given code I want to obtain values in enum class TAT. But we get the only one value ('H' in this case). Can we get all the values of enum in this way? If not what is the alternate way to achieve this goal?

#include #include #include using namespace std; enum class TAT : char{ 'A', 'B', 'C', 'D', 'E', 'F', 'G', 'H', 'I', 'J' }; void usage(TAT& t){ cout
