While motor and oculomotor distractibility are known to influence the response time (RT) and the error rate (ER) in a visual target detection task, it is not known whether motor distractibility will influence the proportion of errors committed, and if so, how this effect might be mediated. In the present study, participants performed a visual target detection task under three conditions, each manipulating the inter-stimulus interval (ISI) between target and distractor, whereby distractor-target ISIs were as short as 20 ms in some trials. Participants made a speeded button press in response to the detection of a visual target, whilst an eye movement was required for some trials to view and categorise a visual distractor. During baseline trials, eye movement times (EMTs) were always longer than the target detection reaction time (RT). Under the distraction condition, the EMT increased more rapidly than the RT, and reached a peak around 20 ms ISI. The proportion of errors committed was also affected by the amount of eye movement required to view the distractor, and the EMT was not significantly longer than the RT in any condition. It is proposed that motor distractibility influences the processing of irrelevant information, which subsequently increases the number of errors. In addition, the disengagement of attention from the target does not slow the RT per se, but rather increases the likelihood of missing the target.- So you've just
